Missouri Quality Award: Prepare for site visit!

Eight examiners will visit The University of Kansas Hospital starting Monday, Sept. 28, to evaluate systems and processes against organizational excellence standards. The three-day site visit is part of the Missouri Quality Award program. It recognizes organizations that can serve as role models to other hospitals and businesses.

“The MQA process is helping us identify our strengths and most important, areas where we can improve,” said Terry Rusconi, director, Organizational Improvement.

Like the Magnet site visit in 2006, MQA examiners will talk with employees about the hospital. “They’ll likely ask what makes our hospital special, how processes work and how we improve them when needed, and what goals are most important to our organization and how we measure our progress,” he said.

Materials distributed Sept. 23-24 with the candy cart should help employees prepare. The September Insider includes a recap of the hospital’s 2009 fiscal year. And refer to the Missouri Quality Award pocket guide for possible questions with answers.

The examiners also will evaluate if hospital systems and processes align with its new vision, mission and values. The guiding principles are printed on badge buddies being distributed by managers. New wall signs display the vision, mission and values in hospital lobbies and departments.

The hospital chose MQA because it uses the same criteria as the Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award. The MQA also is considered one of the best state programs in the country.

*2001 The University of Kansas Physicians

Look just about anywhere in the KU School Medicine. You’ll see an organization dramatically improved since 2002.

A new curriculum was launched. Hundreds of faculty members have joined, including 23 new chairs. The affiliation agreement with The University of Kansas Hospital was strengthened. Research funding and recruiting at the University of Kansas Cancer Center have soared.

“It’s been an impressive seven years,” Barbara Atkinson, MD, the school’s executive dean and executive vice chancellor in the University of Kansas Medical Center, told faculty colleagues during her State of the School annual address.

Two more faculty members at the University of Kansas Medical Center have received Kemper Fellowships for Teaching Excellence.

Doug Wright, PhD, associate professor of Anatomy and Cell Biology, received the award Sept. 14. Janet Pierce, RN, professor of Nursing and adjunct associate professor of Molecular and Integrative Physiology, was honored Sept. 16.

The Kemper fellowships recognize outstanding teachers and advisers at the University of Kansas and KUMC as determined by a seven-member selection committee. Winners receive $5,000 awards. Four KUMC faculty members received Kemper fellowships this year.

Doug Wright joined KUMC in 1997. Besides maintaining a well-funded neuroscience laboratory, he serves as director of Graduate Studies for his department and has advised numerous undergraduate, graduate, medical and MD/PhD students.

Janet Pierce joined KU School of Nursing in 1991. A captain in the U.S. Navy Reserve, she teaches classes at all levels in the school and is an active collaborator with colleagues in Physiology.

A study about smoking bans by David Meyers, MD, KU School of Medicine, is gaining worldwide attention. The study, published in the Sept. 29 issue of the Journal of the American College of Cardiology, has found that public smoking bans can reduce the number of heart attacks by as much as 26 percent per year. The risk is lowered particularly among younger individuals and nonsmokers.

Meyers, professor of Internal Medicine and Preventive Medicine, served as the study’s lead investigator. He and other researchers performed a systematic review and meta-analysis of 10 reports from 11 geographic locations in the United States, Canada and Europe to compare the rates of heart attacks before and after public smoking bans were instituted.

They project a nationwide ban on public smoking could prevent as many as 154,000 heart attacks each year.

With the study’s publication, Meyers has been interviewed by several respected consumer publications and news programs, including the Wall Street Journal.

Sept. 18. “And there are lots of people in this room who made it happen.”

She also sees plenty of challenges:

• Funding remains ominous. State funds to KUMC were cut 12 percent this year, and Atkinson expects another 2 to 5 percent will be cut next year.

• The school is ranked high based on National Institutes of Health funding, its historical yardstick. But the Kansas governor is pushing for the school to become a top 50 medical school based on U.S. News & World Report rankings. KU School of Medicine is in the middle of the pack in those rankings.

Atkinson outlined a number of initiatives for coming years. Among them are strengthen educational programs, grow NIH funding, plan a KUMC-wide capital campaign and develop a funding model for resident students.

Science and Vision Rehabilitation.

Ophthalmology at the University of Kansas Medical Center, was honored Sept. 12 in San Antonio. This is the first time for the award; it now will be given each year at the Envision Conference.

Before joining KUMC, Timberlake served as an associate scientist at the Schepens Eye Research Institute and Harvard Medical School, where he directed the physiological optics group. He is internationally recognized for his contributions to ophthalmic laser technology and low-vision research. Nearly 400 low-vision research and rehabilitation professionals attended the fourth annual conference, which brings together cross-specialty professionals and specialists with a common goal: addressing a growing crisis in vision loss.
